Once upon a time in a lush, green jungle, there lived a little elephant named Ella. Ella was smaller than most of the other elephants, but she had a heart as big as the tallest tree in the jungle. She loved playing with her friends, splashing in the river and running around the tall trees.

Despite her small size, Ella dreamed of being brave like the grown-up elephants, who ventured deep into the jungle and protected the herd.

One day, while the elephants were playing, the sky suddenly darkened. Thunder rumbled, and lightning streaked across the sky. The other young elephants ran to hide behind the big trees, but Ella stood still, looking up at the sky. She felt a shiver of fear, but she knew the herd might need her.

She wanted to be brave. She decided to venture out to see if everyone was safe.

As Ella walked through the jungle, she heard a soft cry. Following the sound, she found a baby rhino stuck in a thick patch of vines. The baby was scared and couldn't move. Ella knew she had to help, even though she wasn't sure how.

She used her strong little trunk to pull at the vines, slowly freeing the baby rhino.

With one final pull, Ella freed the baby rhino. The little rhino was so grateful that it gave her a gentle nuzzle. Ella felt proud—she had been brave!

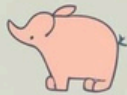

Just then, she heard the thundering footsteps of the adult elephants coming to find her. They had heard about her bravery and were proud of how she had helped the baby rhino. Ella realized that bravery wasn't about being the biggest; it was about caring for others and doing what's right.

From that day on, Ella was known as the brave little elephant who never gave up. She still played and splashed in the river with her friends, but now, whenever there was trouble, the herd knew they could count on her. Ella knew she could be brave, no matter her size, and that made her heart feel bigger than ever.
